Near (niəɹ), adv.[2] (and prep.). Forms: 2–6 ner, 4–7 nere, neer(e; north. and Sc. neir, (5 neyre, 7 neire); 6 nyer, 7 nier; 6–7 neare, 6– near. [a. ON. nær (Da. nær, Sw. när), properly the comparative of nd- = OE. néah NIGH, but also used as a positive: cf. NAR adv.

The transition from the comparative to the positive sense in ON. probably originated in such expressions as koma or ganga nær 'to come or go nearer' (to a person or place), which readily passes into the sense of going absolutely 'close' or 'near'. The positive sense having thus attached itself to the word, nær could be employed with other verbs than those of motion, as standa or vera (to be). A similar development has taken place in MDu. naer near (whence mod. Du. naar, to, for, after, etc.). Even in English some difference is felt in the sense of near according as it goes with a verb of motion or not, and in predicative use after the verb to be (expressed or implied) the adverbial sense tends to pass into a purely adjectival one.

ON. nær (like OE. néar) might be used either absolutely or governing a noun in the dative case. Both usages were adopted in ME., and a further construction introduced by the use of to before the noun. When the noun directly depends on near, this acquires practically the force of a preposition, but differs from real prepositions in having comparative and superlative forms.]

Both in form and gender, however, the word exhibits curious variations in OE. The forms nīed, nýd, nēd would be normal as representatives of a fem. i-stem, but in cases where the gender can be distinguished they usually appear as neuters. A form without umlaut also occurs (néad: cf. the ON. nauð), which appears to have been feminine. The very common form néod, which is distinctly fem., is difficult to account for; if not an independent ablaut-variant, its vowel has probably been influenced by the frequent word néod desire, earnestness, pleasure, etc.]

-ness, suffix, representing OE. -nes(s), -nis(s), -nys(s), fem. (inflected, and later also in nom., -nesse, etc.) = OFris. -nesse, -nisse, OS. -nesse, -nessi, -nissi, -nussi (also -nissea, -nussea; MDu. -nesse, -nisse, Du. -nis), OHG. -nessi, -nassi, -nissi (also -nissa; MHG. -nisse, G. -niss), Goth. -nassus; the -n is originally part of the stem, the real suffix being -assus, formed from weak verbs in -atjan. The variations in the vowel of the West Germanic forms have not been satisfactorily explained.

In middle and early modern English the initial of the suffix is occasionally omitted when preceded by another n, as in brouneuse brownness, cleanesse cleanness, heneuse keenness, meanesse meanness, etc. (cf. note to Fineness).

2. In OE. -nes is the suffix most usually attached to adjectives and past participles to form substantives expressing a state or condition, as bilernes, deorcnes, heardnes, ðolgennes, forþryccednes, etc. A large number of these survive in middle and modern English, and new formations of the same type have been continually made in all periods of the language, it being possible to add the suffix to any adjective or participle, whatever its form or origin may be. Formations from compound adjectives are also common, as selfconceitedness, kindheartedness, square-toedness, watertightness, tonguetiedness, etc.; and even from adjectival phrases, such as used-upness, gut-ableness, up-to-dateness, à-la-modeness, little-boyishness; few of the latter, however, are in established or serious use, and most of them are of recent introduction. This is also the case with formations on pronouns, adverbs, etc., as I-ness, me-ness, whatness; whyness, withoutness, nowness, everydayness, etc. The following are examples of some of the more exceptional uses of the suffix by writers of the 19th century.

1824 Coleridge in Lit. Rem. (1836) II. 424 The exclusive Sir-Thomas-Brown-ness of all the fancies. 1849 Geo. Eliot in Cross Life (1885) I. 319 Dislike-to-getting-up-in-the-morningness. 1859 Sala Gas-light & D. iv. 43 An irreproachable state of clean-shirtedness, navy blue-broadclothedness and chimney-pot-hattedness. 1891 Bax Outlooks New Standp. iii. 109 All nowness is the form of I-ness. Ibid. 201 The in-itself-ness which Kant saw behind the sense-impression. 1893 Morris & Bax Socialism iii. 58 The this-worldliness.. of barbarian society.

3. Uses of the suffix somewhat varying from those mentioned above occur in a few words, such as Forceness, Milkness, Wilderness, Witness.

In OE. a few combs. of this type appear with the bare adj. stem nīw-, nīg-, nī-, as nīwlyrwyd new-tarred, nī(w)cealct new-chalked, nīgbacen, new-baked; with these compare the numerous ON. forms in ný-, as nýfundinn, -gefinn, -tekinn, etc.

NOTE.

THIS double section (which has been enlarged by 21 pages, so as to complete the letter N) contains 1954 Main words, 190 Combinations explained under these, and 1172 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms, etc., making 3316 in all. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated by quotations number 1007, and bring up the total number of entries to 4323. Of the Main words 705 are marked † as obsolete, and 92 are marked ‖ as alien or not completely naturalized.

Comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded, Niche to Nywe	379	1768	1979	1838	4323
Words illustrated by quotations	298	564	746	182	3787
Number of quotations	912	848	1854	230	19586

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 757.

The second half of N does not differ essentially from the first in the character of the words it includes. Both the native English and the Latin element are strongly represented, and between them far exceed the contributions from all other sources. Among those words which have either come down from Old English, or have been naturally developed at a later date, may be mentioned nigh, night (with its many combs., as nightingale, nightmare, nightshade), nim, nimble, nine, nit, noll, north, nose, nostril, now, numb, nuncheon, nut, nuzzle (vb.[1]). In such words as nill (vb.), no, none, nor, not, nothing, nought, the n- represents the prefixed negative ne, and further illustration of this is afforded by the obsolete nis, nys (is not), nist (knew not), not or note (know not). In nickname and nonce the n- properly belongs to the article. The chief adoptions from Scandinavian are nieve (fist), niggle, nithing (the corrupt form of which, niddering, is here traced to its source), Norn (two words), nowt (also written nolt) and the obsolete nite (to deny), nowcin (need). German and Dutch have supplied only a few words, as nickel, nix, nixie, nock (yard-arm), nordkaper, Norse. The nock of a bow or arrow may also be from Dutch or Low German; the proper meaning of this in contrast to notch is here clearly shown.

Among words which appear to belong to the native stock, but of which the precise origin is obscure, are nick (sb.[1] and v.[1]), nincompoop, ninny, nip, nipple, nob, nobble, nod, noddle, noddy, nog, noggin, noodle, nook, nugget, nuzzle (v.[2]).

Of Latin words a few have been adopted without any change of form, as nidus, nimbus, nostrum, notandum, November, nucleus, nux vomica. Many others have been assimilated to the usual types, as node, nodule, nominal, nominate, normal, notable, notary, notion, notorious, noxious, numeral, etc. The admission of noon and nun took place in Old English. As usual, many of the Latin words came through older French, which has also contributed niece, noise, Norman, noun, nourice (nurse), nourish, Nowel, noy, nuisance, number, numbles, nurture, nyas. It is also probable that niggard and its obsolete synonym nigon are Anglo-French forms. A very important addition to the language was moreover made by the gradual introduction of L. non (at first in the Anglo-French form noun-) as a prefix; the great extent to which this has finally been employed is shown here under the article NON- and in the main words following it. From modern French come nougat, noyau, nuance, while Italian has supplied nicolo, niello, and nuncio.

The Greek element is mainly scientific, as in the combs. with nitro-, nomo-, noso-, nolo-, nyct-, nympho-, but also includes the common words nomad and nymph.

Oriental and other non-European languages are represented by nigua, nipa, nocake, norimon, nucha, nuggar, nullah, numdah, nuphar, nuzzer, nylghau, and some others.

For reasons of historical or other interest attention may also be directed to the articles on nicker sb.[1], nicolian(a, nill (sb.[1]), nisi prius, noli me tangere, nonconformist, nonjuror, nosloc, novel (sb.), and nutmeg.
